Hi,

I hope this message finds you well.

I am a computer science student at the University of Nairobi, set to graduate on 22nd September this year. I have interest in the activities that you do at your company and I would really like to work with you.

I must admit, my reasons for wanting to teach are not necessarily noble. But here are my reasons why I would like to teach for some time:

Therapy. No, I am not going to release trauma on children... It's just that teaching feels therapeutic.

I would not want children to think tech is for money, or tech is hard, or tech is always competitive. I would like them to see tech as a means to satisfy their curiosities about the world. Tech is not all business and professionalism. The fun part comes first, then the rest.

When I look back at my development style, I attribute it to books that I read outside class. Books written by authors who did not treat tech in a "textbook" way. I would like to do that for others.

This leap would be a statement to my future self : "fun and curiosity come first". So in the end, both teacher and student would have learnt something.

warm regards,

Kiarie
